Multi-media artist Tim Hahn seeks to produce art that is successful at the most basic level - informed by his belief that “we are in an age where it is difficult to distinguish the difference between media advertising, comic book illustrations, computer generated or graffiti art.” His Sheldon exhibition includes pieces created in the past year, showcasing works that function as “objects” with a definite physicality, and that develop a relationship between color, form and material.

Hahn describes his pieces as “a summary of an esthetic and physical activity up to the point the piece is finished.” Whether the work communicates anything deeper than a purely visual experience is up to the viewer. As Hahn explains, “the work could be about everything or it could be about nothing. I’m not sure.”
